UNH Feminist Leadership

First Feminist Leadership Class - Fall 2013

Jensen Judd, Erica Tamposi, and Cecilia Martins, are three students who took the course: WS 505: Feminist Leadership, taught by Professor, Kate Hanson. Jensen is a senior pursuing a double major in Nutrition and Wellness and Women’s Studies, Erica is a senior majoring in Communications and Film and Cecilia is a first year Political Science major and Women’s Studies minor. Each of these women have very different interests, but all worked together on a project for the Feminist Leadership Class.

Jensen, Erica, and Cecilia worked together on a project highlighting different organizations and how inclusive they are. They decided to focus on the Women’s Studies Program. Through their semester-long project they learned how to plan an event and got to look at the process of how organizations work.

Although Jensen, Erica, and Cecilia come from different academic backgrounds and enjoy different passions, they all agree that they loved the Feminist Leadership class. They believe that students took this course because they had already seen themselves as leaders and wanted to learn how to work with independent, confident people like themselves.

These three women have goals that bring in feminist leadership ideals to their lives. After graduation, Jensen is deciding between getting her Masters of Education or becoming a health educator. Erica hopes to become a successful director. Cecilia hopes to find meaningful work and she strives everyday to achieve that goal.

To learn more about their project and Feminist Leadership at UNH, come to the UNH Undergraduate Research Conference (URC) on Friday, April 25 12:15-1:25 pm in the MUB. If you also want to take a class on Social Justice and Leadership, register for WS 505: Leadership in the Real World in Fall 2014.
